Kennedy picked up at least 29 1/2 additional convention votes, Saturday from Democratic Party state meetings in Connecticut and Colorado.

contractor, onetime Democratic candidate for mayor and was an Olympic rowing champion. He also was president of the Atlantic City, N. J., race track.

Kelly, an immensely proud man, had one burning ambition that was fulfilled 27 years after what he called "the heartbreak" of his rejection from competition in the famed Henley rowing regatta in England.

Kelly's application to the famed regatta was rejected because he once had worked with his hands, as a bricklayer. The rules of the Thames River classic at that time were not directed at Kelly, but, by his own account, the incident left an emotional scar he vowed to clear. He regarded his rejection as English snobbery.

He groomed his only son, John B. Kelly Jr., for the Henley competition. In 1947 young Kelly entered and won the famed sculling classic.

former Minister Jacques Soustelle and former Premiers Georges Bidault and Maurice Bourges Mounoury.

They threw down the gauntlet to De Gaulle in a resolution voted at the end of a special meeting in the city hall of suburban Vincennes.

"The participants of the Vincennes conference reject any formula such as that of an 'Algerian Algeria' which would lead fatally to secession and to a dictatorship of terrorism (in Algeria)," the resolution said.

(An "Algerian Algeria" was the phrase adopted by De Gaulle to describe his own favored idea of Algeria's future, as a self-governing country closely tied to France.)

The conference pledged itself "in all circumstances" to fight for a "French Algeria," completely integrated with France, which is what the vast majority of Algeria's one million settlers are demanding.
