Moms Hold Reign In Port Town Of Bagnara Calabra

REGGIO CALABRIA, June 8 (UPI) — Bagnara Calabra on the "toe" of Italy is one of the last surviving regions of European-style "Mommism."

But the Bagnara "mom" has few home appliances and no motor car. Unlike her American equivalent she keeps her predominance over her menfolk only by back-breaking physical work.

Tradition and the hopelessness of chronic unemployment push the men into the background. Women do most of the work in the district and consequently everyone takes notice of them.

The women of Bagnara work at anything, according to seasonal conditions. They tend orange and lemon crops, make charcoal and help the non-Bagnaran men who run the district's tuna fishing industry.

One of the most common jobs of the Bagnara "mom" is smuggling salt over from Sicily, a few miles away.

Salt is free of tax in Sicily, which has a strong regional government. It is much cheaper than the state-monopoly salt sold on the mainland.

The women of Bagnara ignore police regulations and each morning take the ferry from Villa San Giovanni across to Messina in Sicily and return with cheap salt tucked in sacks under their skirts.

Hard-pressed customs officers have little choice but to shirk the tremendous job of searching every woman on the boat every day.

Modernity Makes Inroads Into Timelessness Of Elba

PORTOFERRAIO, Isle of Elba, June 8 (UPI) — This island where emperor Napoleon Bonaparte once plotted his escape from the island of Elba is losing its famed atmosphere of timelessness to the inroads of modernity. Many residents are wondering if mass tourism to the island will defeat its purpose by ruining the quiet beauties that bring the tourists.

Modern ferry steamers can carry 6,000 passengers with 180 cars and 21 buses a day on the 1½-hour trip from Piombino on the Italian mainland. A modern network of widened asphalt highways carry the cars through the quiet countryside where once a rough Napoleonic-era track ran.

Glittering Neon
Hotels have sprung up across the island, ranging from those offering de luxe accommodation down to family pensions. Neon lights, glittering bars and dance-floors, now dot the isle.

Elba is rich in beauty. It has a sunburned coastline of jutting rock and wide sandy beaches. It offers first class deep sea fishing and quiet camping spots.

The tourists may complain about other tourists, but the island people welcome them all for the boom they gave its sagging vine-growing economy.

Elba, 19 miles by 6½, is the largest of the Tuscan Archipelago, 5 miles off the coast of the mid-Italian province of Tuscany. It has a population of 30,000.

The island is known throughout the world because Napoleon returned to it as sole ruler, for a year in 1814-15 and planned the Battle of Waterloo in a last — unsuccessful — attempt to win back his power.
