

Italy's First 'Triangle' Victim

Italy's new traffic code requires every motorist to carry a foot-high red triangular reflector. He is supposed to put it up as a warning sign for other drivers whenever he halts on a highway outside a city.

Thursday Giovanni Prato, 63, pulled over on a country road outside Turin in North Italy. It was foggy and slippery. He wanted to wait for the fog to lift.

Following the rule book, he walked back up the road 30 yards or so to put up his red triangle. Just as he put it down, a truck came out of the fog and struck him. He died clutching the red triangle.

AF Identifies 'Lady Be Good' Airmen Lost In Libyan Desert

WIESBADEN, Germany, Feb. 19 (UPI)—The U.S. Air Force today tentatively identified airmen who died in the 1943 Libyan desert crash of the Liberator bomber "Lady Be Good." The identification was made by a U.S. Army mortuary team now in the desert to recover the bodies of the nine bomber crewmembers.

The team has found five bodies together with a diary piecing together the last days of the ill-fated airplane.

Team experts, lead by Capt. Myron Fuller, of Placerville, Calif., identified the five bodies so far found as those of pilot 1st Lt. William F. Hutton; co-pilot 2nd Lt. Robert F. Toner; navigator 2nd Lt. D. P. Hayes; crewmember T. Sgt. Robert E. Damotte, and crewmember S. Sgt. Samuel R. Adams.

The Air Force said the team has not been able to supply further identity as yet.

The diary showed the other four crewmembers did not die at the same location as the five so far discovered.

One failed to join the party after bailing out from the bomber, and three later left the group to continue on ahead to search for help.

The tentative identification was made with the help of diary entries, dog tags, an identity book, an Air Force ring, and other personal effects.

Capt. Fuller has messaged, according to Air Force spokesmen, that the man who failed to join the party after bailing out was 2nd Lt. John S. Woravka, bombardier, and the three who left the main group to look for help were T. Sgt. Harold S. Ripslinger, S. Sgt. Guy E. Sheeley, and S. Sgt. Vernon L. Moore.

Other Bodies

The diary indicated that there is no possibility the other bodies will be found in the immediate location. It was previously thought the remains of the other four members of the crew might be buried in the sand nearby.

The time the crew bailed out, the diary showed, was five days before the group arrived at the present location on April 9, 1943. The last entry was made April 12, but experts said the exact date of death is not known.

No final identification will be made in the field, the mortuary team said.

Chessman Wins 60-Day Execution Stay feared hostile demonstration against President Eisenhower on his visit March 2, if the kidnaper died.

This prompted his decision to turn the matter over to the California legislature, Brown said.

"If the people, acting through their elected representatives, determine that the present law should be continued in effect, Cary Chessman will be executed under the law."

"I hope the legislature will abolish capital punishment, but I, of course, will abide by its decision—whatever that decision may be," Brown said.

The governor, referring to the President's forthcoming South American trip, said Rubottom's telegram said Uruguay had expressed "grave concern... over anticipated hostile demonstrations of student elements and others to Chessman's execution when our President visits Uruguay March 2."

Brown said California are "clearly divided" on the issue.

In tens of thousands of communications he has received in the Chessman case and the history of the case, he said, "have centered not so much on the person of Cary Chessman and his history as on whether this state shall continue capital punishment."

The governor pointed out that three of the seven justices of the State Supreme Court and Federal District Court Judge Louis Goodman, the federal judge who has had most to do with the case, all recommended clemency.

"I do not know all of their reasons," Brown said, "but it has been demonstrated to me that there is a basic division among us."

The legislature, which reconvenes Feb. 29, has several times rejected bills that would have abolished capital punishment. The most recent rejection was at the 1959 session.

The State Department telegram to Brown was one of several thousand delivered to the governor's office on the Chessman case yesterday.

It was almost lost in the shuffle but was spotted by Cecil Poole, the governor's clemency secretary.

In Washington, Rubottom said "of course I conferred with my superiors" before sending the telegram to Brown. He said "there were other expressions of concern about the case, I think from Brazil."

But he said the Uruguayan communication was the primary factor. Rubottom said he had no personal feeling about the Chessman case. "All I did was express the concern passed on by this other government."
