Western intervention.

● Presumably Indian Prime Minister Nehru will discuss the border situation with President Eisenhower when the U.S. leader visits New Delhi next month.

● U.S. officials have discussed the possibility that more of the cost of Western European defense might be borne by allied countries in Europe but there has been no decision and no discussion with allied governments.

Replying to a question, Herter said the Eisenhower administration is considering economic aid for India in line with its policy of helping Prime Minister Nehru's government develope the Indian economy.

He did not say, however, how much the newest aid allotment would be. About $450 million of American economic aid went to India in the past year.

In talking about the Indian-China border dispute, Herter at first said he did not wish to take sides in this argument because he has no firsthand knowledge about this problem.

including assurances and guarantees to all nations, including the Soviet Union, against armed attack.

● Stand ready, even while Soviet policy continued committed to a notion of peace that did not seem just, to negotiate about measures to slow and to discipline the race in arms.

Rockefeller said the Soviets had offered "some rather peculiar terms" for relaxing tensions, including recognition of the status quo in eastern Europe.

"We cannot stand for self-determination in Asia and Africa, as we do and must, while denying it in Europe," he said. "Whatever reassurances we may give the Soviets against military measures, they cannot ask us to protect then from the moral and political consequences of their own acts of oppression."

De Gaulle For UK

Paris talks with Foreign Minister Maurice Couve de Murville that Britain now supports the "cautious" De Gaulle plan for the summit approach.

Whatever the British motives, there was no doubt about Lloyd's success in improving the long-troubled relations between Britain and France.

In the course of two short days, the official French view of British policies appeared to have changed completely.

In return for Britain's unstinting support of De Gaulle's approach-to-the-summit program, Lloyd appeared to have made progress for Britain in one important domain.

That was one the future of political links between the six nations of the "Little Europe" community and the other nations of Europe.

In the Paris talks, Lloyd expressed support for the projected political consultations between the "Little Six." In return for this, he won French support for a scheme to hold parallel political consultations within the framework of the Western European Union — an organization which links Britain directly with the "Little Europe" six.

Pierre Baraduc, spokesman for the French Foreign Ministry, and John Russell, spokesman for the British Foreign Office, gave a brief summary of the meetings at a joint news conference.

'West Morals Inviolable': Diplomat

the permanence of the two blocks. For my part, studying Mr Khrushchev's declarations, I am more inclined to believe he conceives the distension in terms of 'competitive co-existence,' which is yet another thing.

"We should certainly not oppose any signs of relaxation of the international tension," Straneo continued, but bound to this view is "the fact that the solidarity between the United States and Europe must remain in force as a constant factor in world politics.

"Lack of European unity brought about two tragic wars . . . and we do not want a third one."

Turning to the moral question, Straneo observed that "it is our belief that the Christian morality is universal and capable of winning all hearts."

He recalled that in Rome "the principle of peace and justice was founded," pointing out that "the reason and humanity of the Greeks, the religious earnestness of the Hebrew and the juridical sense of the Romans formed the basis of our European and Christian culture.

"The preachers of distension cannot go so far as to pretend that for the sake of it we should renounce our way of living. Nothing is to be changed and nothing will change in our morality. We want to build on rocks and not on sand."

Straneo praised the late Gen. George C. Marshall as the man to whom Italy owes its "complete economic recovery," and lauded U.S. Ambassador James D. Zellerbach, a guest at the luncheon, for his part in the "intelligent and efficient administration" of Marshall Plan aid in Italy just after the war.
